From the Book Review Editor

KRISTOPHER WELLS

University of Alberta (Canada)

Over the past three years, it has been my honour to serve as the Book Review Editor for Complicity. As the Journal transitions to a new editorial team, I would like to thank all of the book review authors that I have had the pleasure to work with in crafting their essays. Collectively, we have attempted to open a space for dialogue centered around the question: “What is complexity and how might it prompt new understandings of education and educational research?” This rich and unfolding dialogue weaved its way through classic and newer works in the diverse field of complexity studies. The authors, through critique, conversation, and collaboration, have enriched our discourse and provided an important service to the field as they have questioned under theorized positions, oriented us to new possibilities, and explored what complexity science has to offer to education. It is with sincere gratitude that I extend my appreciation to all of our reviewers, authors of books, and to you the reader for expanding the horizon of possibilities for what it means to think, act, and do research and teaching differently.

It is with great admiration that I welcome our new book review editor, Darren Stanley (see the next page for some brief introductory comments from Darren). I know that under his guidance the book reviews presented in Complicity will continue to expand in quality and enrich us with their diversity.
