

Contributors

Michael Norman Aston is currently a senior manager with the Government of Alberta, where he has pursued a career in information management, privacy and security. He holds graduate degrees in Russian Studies (McMaster) and information and library science (Western Ontario). He graduated with a Master's of Arts degree in Classics at the University of Alberta (1998). His thesis topic was Horace and the Justice of Crime and Punishment.

Curtis Bauer is currently pursuing an MA degree in history at the University of Alberta. He is researching the evolution of science, focusing on "revolutionary" periods when the underlying system of knowledge production is particularly visible.

Angeles Espinaco-Virseda is a graduate student at the University of Alberta. She is pursuing a Master of Arts in Modern German History. Her current research is on sexuality and identity formation.

Bettina Liverant is a doctoral candidate at the University of Alberta. Her dissertation, entitled Buying Happiness, examines the emergence and formation of a new ethos of consumption in Canada, 1890-1960.

Nicholas Turse is a doctoral candidate in the Program in the History of Public Health and Medicine at Columbia University and an Officer in the Department of Epidemiology, Columbia University. His current research interests include the history of medical experimentation on Hansen's disease patients in Hawaii, post-traumatic stress disorder among U.S. veterans of the Vietnam War and a project focusing on the interplay of industry, technology, medicine and public health during the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Brad Wuetherick is an MA student at the University of Alberta studying the economic and social impact of the Hundred Years War on 14th and 15th century rural England, supervised by John Langdon. He is also the President of the University of Alberta Graduate Students' Association and Chair of the Graduate Students' Association of Canada.